From his childhood on, Henry Brant had undertaken a study of the existing much-admired orchestration texts (some with wide circulation). In many of them he discovered not only errors of fact, but also significant areas of omission. In consequence, many of the new works he heard at orchestral concerts were expressed in unbalanced sonorities and in timbral qualities of poor resonance. It seemed apparent to Brant that, "a set of practical guides to the actual sound of the instruments (rather than to hoped-for evocations of mystic visions) would simplify the task of conductors, instrumentalists and audiences alike." Textures and Timbres is such an effort. At age twelve (1925), Henry Brant began keeping notebooks of orchestral combinations. Over the years, he continued this practice. In the early 1940s he decided to prepare a new orchestration textbook; and its last page was not written until late 2005. Since the materials for Textures and Timbres are consistently based on real-life experimentation, the writing necessarily occupied several decades. The process was closely interwoven with Brant's entire career, running parallel to it. He adapted the book's materials from his extensive commercial work in radio, from interactions with his orchestration classes at The Juilliard School, Columbia University and Bennington College, from his numerous orchestrations of documentary and Hollywood films, as well as from his own experimental composing and his years spent in orchestrating Charles Ives's Concord Sonata (A Concord Symphony, which was completed in 1994). Textures and Timbres is the result of a single conception that began in boyhood and continued as a lifelong pursuit: an acute interest in experimentation with orchestral combinations [Publisher description]
